Disconnect to Reconnect

It has been proven that excessive "screen time" negatively affects our health in the areas of sleep, activity/mobility, vision & eye fatigue, and posture - among others. Do you know how much time you spend using your cell phone? Seeing the cold, hard numbers might be just the right inspiration to put it down. Yes, there are apps for that. Here are some other suggestions that can help us make positive changes:

Turn off alerts. It is easy to ignore it if the phone does not buzz every few seconds. If you cannot afford to miss certain things, set it so that only certain information gets through.

Put a reminder rubber band around the apparatus as a barrier to tapping and scrolling without thinking.

Speak positivity: "I get to do something else instead" feels better than "I can't use my phone". Make that a screen saver message.

Get an actual alarm clock: Avoid getting sucked in the media abyss after hitting the snooze button. Try recharging overnight in another room and adhering to a certain time each day to begin access; perhaps after morning prayers, devotional time, or Bible study.

Schedule tech-free time: Some experts suggest going cold-turkey for 3 days. If you cannot imagine that, try being device-free for an hour or so each evening before and during dinner, as well as each Sunday afternoon. Instead, engage in conversation, a walk or other healthy physical activity. These are good times to use your phone's Do Not Disturb setting.

Create tech-free zones: It is not hygienic to take your phone out while in the bathroom. Why not expand its absence from the meal table, playtime and drive time? Of course it is unsafe and illegal to be distracted behind the wheel.

It is all certain to be more successful if we hold one another accountable; try partnering with at least one other person for support.

~Ephesians 4:16~
